Eagle Eye

State Natural Area

Description

Eagle Eye State Natural Area is a 70-acre tract of land within the Cade Archaeological District. This land was protected through a partnership between Mississippi Valley Conservancy, Mississippi Valley Archaeology Center, The Archaeological Conservancy, and the State of Wisconsin's Knowles-Nelson Stewardship Program.

The site includes scenic ridge top bluffland, including native goat prairie, oak opening, sandstone cliffs and rock shelters, forest, wetlands, and a portion of the Bad Axe River. The property is in the National Register of Historic Places for its eagle-eye rock shelter and 7 effigy mounds. The mounds include a bear, panther, turtle, two bird effigy's, and two linear mounds; all facing the river and dating to approximately 1050 AD. The area also includes the largest population in the state of the state-threatened cherrystone drop snail, as well as populations of the state threatened cerulean warbler and four-toed salamander. This area is a popular trout fishing location only ¼ mile west of Duck Egg County Park. The land is now open to the public for hiking, hunting, fishing, snow-shoeing and cross-country skiing.

Stewardship

The purchase was made in partnership with The Archaeological Conservancy, a national archaeological organization, and the state's Knowles-Nelson Stewardship Fund. "The work of land conservation is not just about protecting nature—plants, animals and ecosystems—but also protecting human values and cultural landscapes." —William Cronon, University of Wisconsin-Madison.
